Kenyan wins award for solutions to daily woes

BY MAGDALENE WANJA

A Kenyan writer and motivational speaker has bagged a prize from an intercontinental organisation for offering solutions to everyday problems.

Dr. Mohamed Bahadair, a Mombasa-born PhD holder in management, bagged this year's Best Personal Brand Award from the Middle East, North Africa and Asia Award Organisation (Menas). He received his award, which does not come with monetary benefits, on Wednesday evening.

ferently. Secondly, human beings are generally reluctant to change their minds about subjects on which they have strong feelings or which have served them well. Why? Because such a transformation may involve discarding some habits, adopting others, adapting to some more, and changing one's lifestyle. Books do exactly that. They force one to set aside time to read; to ponder what to read. What actually do our leaders read? Do they read fiction? Books on the environment? Religious tracts? Remember the Oprah Winfrey Book Club? A mere mention of a book as appearing on the Club's reading list induces many people to look for it.

As the year ends, American radio and TV programmes will be scrambling to ask significant public figures — the Clintons, the Obamas, Warren Buffett, etc — what they are reading.

'enjoying' the reading. The joy — from enjoying the reading — can spread to the reader's other activities in life. If it is about meeting the expectations of a reading club, then the reader goes to the meeting knowing that they have done what is expected of them — they feel good.

Yet still, there is more work in having to recall the storyline, the characters, the time and place where even ~~books~~ books available as they are on the streets (even at Sh20) and on the internet (thus on the phone), some effort has to be expended in reading, sharing what one has read and encouraging others to read.

come out amazing if the books were employed in the correct way. Mixing prose and dialogue was ill-advised. It's more captivating to the reader to be inside open and closing quotation marks. Also, Zoo is not coherent. The fact that I had to read and reread pages one to 30 made me lose interest in the book. I only kept reading because it is not good manners not to finish reading a book.

One more feather in the cap of Mombasa author Bahaidar

BY MAGDALENE WANJA

Kenya's Dr Mohamed Bahaidar is the latest winner of the prestigious Best Personal Brand Award of the 2019 Menaa Awards.

The award recognises service level, corporate culture and leadership skills within organisations in the Middle East, North Africa and Asia.

The Mombasa-born PhD holder in management has authored five books, whose topics revolve around day-to-day life.

His recent award was as a result of using his books to offer solutions to everyday problems, according to the Menaa Organization.

The organisers noted that Dr Bahaidar's visionary and innovative ways of bringing a difference to the world made him stand out.

Dr Bahaidar says he decided to write books to inspire people following his difficult childhood.

He wrote his first book, The Hidden Self, in 2009 and published it in 2012.

He noted that growing up, he had no confidence in himself and the vast majority of people did not see anything good in him.

Such were the circumstances that the writer had to put up with, though he lived with his immediate family who believed in him no matter what and supported him.

"I did not lack even a single textbook because my parents provided all that was needed to see me through my early education, but even after all that, I emerged at the bottom of my class," he recalls.

'Grave concerns'

He went to two nursery schools. He moved from one school to another and even repeated Standard Four three times in three different schools.

He recalls the tears rolling down his mother's cheeks for his lack of success through his entry exams for Standard One. She was dismayed.

"Have you ever had grave concerns and self-defeating thoughts about yourself? Ever looked at yourself in the mirror and all that you saw was a dim, foolish individual who is considered 'dumb'?" these are some of the questions that the author asks.

Dr Bahaidar said that at 18, he sought help from a mentor, Babu Ali Mandri, who introduced him to self-help books.

"These ignited a positive spirit within me that brought an understanding of the need

In the course of his work, Dr. Mohamed Bahaidar has inspired a lot of people from all diverse parts of the society seeing him receive the coveted Meena Award in Muscat, Oman.

The award is proof of his success story which led to him receiving a lot of recognition by a lot of media houses all around the world.

My work as a motivational speaker suits the vast population educating it to understand the driving factors of a society without any bias. My work is inclined to particularly guard and counsel the youth in line with the belief that they are our future leaders. We indulge in diverse everyday topics making it easier to engage with them, raising awareness on topics prevalent to our society, distinguishing right and wrong from a cultural and ethical perspective.
